I would like to sincerely thank the voters of Lowell for supporting my campaign and our vision for the city in yesterday's preliminary election.

The results sent a resounding message - voters want honest and straightforward leadership, and elected officials that are willing to take a stand on issues that impact those who they are sent to city hall to represent. That is what our campaign is all about.

In recent months, we have taken our message to every neighborhood in Lowell. On every street I've walked, I've heard from voters who believe that our city council needs to do a better job listening to the people of Lowell.

While much more is at stake in 2017 than the high school decision, yesterday made clear that many people have felt left out of this critically important debate. My task as a candidate is to continue to listen to every point of view, and I hope to have the opportunity to carry the diverse perspectives I have encountered with me to the city council.

I look forward to continuing my efforts to spread my message in the weeks leading up to the general election. With your support, we can bring leadership that engages everybody who calls Lowell home back to city hall. Together, we can make Lowell happen.
